BART's Tiny Program

By Kenneth McFarland

One common problem that plagues any BART rider is that they have to carry a large number of tickets with them at all times to be able to hop on their tickets up to where they want to travel. So, what can be done with those unused, non-transferable BART tickets? McFarland says there are two types of tickets that are being offered for free to riders who have unused tickets that they no longer want to keep. The first type is a ticket that is valid for a single ride on the BART system. The second type is a ticket that is valid for a round trip on the BART system.

The Better Bay Community Foundation provides an opportunity for riders to donate their unused BART tickets to the Foundation, which will then sell the tickets to riders who need them. McFarland says that the Foundation has been very successful in getting people to donate their unused BART tickets, and that the Foundation is expanding its efforts to include other modes of transportation in the Bay Area.

In addition, the BART system is offering a program that allows riders to exchange their unused BART tickets for a one-time use ticket. This program is called the “Tiny Ticket” program, and it is available at select BART stations throughout the system.

The Tiny Ticket program allows riders to exchange their unused BART tickets for a one-time use ticket. The tickets are available at select BART stations throughout the system. To participate in the program, riders must present their unused BART tickets to the ticket agent at the station, along with a valid form of identification. Once the ticket is exchanged, the unused BART ticket is no longer valid and cannot be exchanged again.

The Tiny Ticket program is a win-win situation for both BART riders and the BART system. For riders, it is a convenient way to get rid of their unused BART tickets and to have a ticket available for a one-time use. For the BART system, it is a cost-effective way to keep their system running smoothly and to ensure that riders have access to tickets when they need them.
